Dolly Seacord: Well it was a great building.

Jessica Griffen: Um, what kind of memories do you have of Old Main?

DS: Well I have a lot because we had so many, uh, classes there. Um, English and all, well most of my classes except the ones for commerce, my major, was, eh, they were at Cook Hall; and then my minor were in the McCormack Gym. Anatomy and things like that that I had to take and the classes, gym classes and so forth that I took of course were at McCormack Gym, but everything else was in Old Main. And, uh, Four Corners, now I'm sure you've heard of that, that was where they had bulletin boards. And everyone would meet at Four Corners. And, uh, sometimes you met your date there, so [laughs] but any way, that was a popular spot. Well we passed it every day, you know, every time you go to or from a class. And I can't remember which floors, I know there were no elevators, there were just the stairways, wide stairways, in wood of course. And then, um, down below there was a lounge. Now I suppose that would be like a student union today, where people met. And my second year there I had to work in a home in Bloomington, take care of a little girl part of the time, and um, so I had to take my lunch so that's where we gals that did that sort of thing and came in from Bloomington on a bus, that's where we always ate our lunch, in that lounge downstairs.
